The success of the play in the United States has been more than duplicated in London, where it was produced at the Strand Theatre on July 12 last, and made an instantaneous hit. It is still running there, and seems likely to do so for a year at least.

The Vermonter.

The current number of The Vermonter is devoted to a profusely illustrated history of Admiral Dewey, whom the nation is just now busy honoring. There are 40 illustrations, and the magazine is made unusually attractive by the fine cuts and interesting text. As a souvenir of a particularly memorable period in the history of Vermont and the entire country this number is valuable.

A large edition has been printed, so that extra copies may be easily had at the news stands or the home office in St. Albans.

Capt. Sulloway used good judgment in his plays and played a strong game in every way, but gave his signals too slow. Brown backed the line well and Ranney at right tackle played a strong game, being in every play and making one touchdown by falling on the ball at an opportune moment.

The other men played well. The principal weakness of the team was in catching punts and in getting their plays off fast enough.

The work of the team would have been a surprise to any one and should draw good crowd to their home games. The line up was as follows
